A middle aged man wearing a dirty raincoat, who badly needed a shave and looked as though he hadn't wash for a month, came out of public lavatory with a cloth bag of tools folded beneath his arm. Standing for a moment on the edge of the pavement to adjust his cap the cleanest thing about him- he looked casually to left and right and, when the flow of traffic had eased off, crossed the road. His name and trade were always spoken in one breath, even when the nature of this trade was not in question: Ernest Brown the upholsterer.

Every night before returning to his lodgings he left the bag of tools for safety with a man who looked after the public lavatory near the town center, for he felt there was risk of them being lost or stolen should he take them back to his room, and if such a thing were to happen his living would be gone. Chimes to the value of half past ten boomed from the Council house clock. Over the theatre patches of blue sky held hard won positions against autumnal clouds, and a treacherous wind lashed out its gusts, sending paper and cigarette packets cartwheeling along un swept gutters. Empty bellied Ernest was ready for his breakfast, so he walked through a café doorway, instinctively lowering his head as he did so, though the beams were a foot above his height.
